

In 1798 John Fairburn published a set of fifty-two cards, about 60 x 90 mm., with maps of the English and Welsh counties engraved by Robert Rowe after John Cary (see 1789). The game involved identifying each county's adjacent counties. The county towns have the mileage to London engraved adjacent to their names.

caburden.com

In the same year there was a second state with additions to the canals and roads, and new figures indicating adjacent counties (see Lincolnshire above). The maps are also known in this state but on paper only. Robert Rowe later engraved another set of cards with very similar maps for Joseph Allen (see 1811) and only a handful of examples of both of these have survived.

The Game of English geography: being a sett of county maps on cards. London, John Fairburn, 1798, 1798.

The Juvenile county atlas: a new geographical game with a set of county maps on cards. London, Joseph Allen & others, (180?).

